INTRODUCTION

The Search for American Data

In 1980, Neil Michelsen, president of Astro Computing Services, very generously agreed to let us use the large and accurate computer capacity of A.C.S. for our research. So, we decided to spend a year in California, utilizing this opportunity to systematically collect officially certified American birth data in the same way as we had done in Europe. In our opinion, American astrological literature had relied too heavily on the private sort of information that our statistical verification had shown to be undependable.

We were soon confronted with the reasons for the extensive use of private information about dates and hours of the births of American celebrities. Official birth records are only more recently obtainable in the United States: from 1910 to 1950 for most of the states and nonexistent even today in some. The hour of birth is less regularly recorded. Also, there is no official constraint to register a birth within a certain time frame, making much delayed birth registrations untrustworthy for the date and, a fortiori, for the hour of birth. Furthermore, birth records are not considered public in the U.S.A. A fee of two to five dollars is required when the information is available, and many registrars altogether refuse to give out the information, considering the birth data as private information, to which only the subject or his legal representative may have access. Hence, officially certified birth data are sparse in American astrological literature.

However, our training as scientists motivated us to establish an objectively demonstrable background for our statistical studies. In Europe, our results had proven to be clearer with officially ascertained data than with private information.

Despite all the difficulties that we foresaw, we began our extensive search for officially certified birth data in the United States.

Harvesting the American Birth Certificates

Although we started with some six thousand basic data gathered from the above references, the difficulties effectively proved to be enormous. Sometimes we felt extremely discouraged by the innumerable refusals encountered. Finally, the hours of birth for approximately 1400 of the data were officially confirmed.

Even so, the data for many of the most renowned names could not be ascertained. For example, we received the birth certificate of John Sheldon Eisenhower (author and diplomat); but that of his famous father, General

Dwight Eisenhower, proved to be unavailable. We had that of Henry Ford II, but not that of his grandfather, Henry Ford I, founder of the Ford Automobile Company. In the field of science, in which renown often comes late, nearly all the available dictionaries listed persons born before the onset of the twentieth century. In the fields of theater, show business, literature and art, California was a good hunting place, but New York, the main place of origin of celebrities in these fields, did not concede to deliver any birth certificates — a big loss that has no remedy at the moment.

The 1400 official and complete birth data were divided into sub-samples corresponding to the main professional activities already studied in Europe: Actors, Artists, Authors, Executives, Politicians, Soldiers, Scientists, Sports Champions. For each of these fields, we had a precise hypothesis based on our previous results. Jupiter was expected to be dominant for actors and politicians, Mars for soldiers and sports champions, Saturn for scientists and so on.

The results were fully in agreement with these expectations. They were not very significant in each small subgroup due to size; however, the summation of our various hypotheses yielded the expected strong confirmation, with no contradiction that would impair it. These results are published with more details in a technical publication of our laboratory, Report on American Data, by Michel Gauquelin (Laboratoire d'Etude des Relations entre Rhythmes Cosmiques et Psychophysiologiques, 1982).

References for the Character Traits

The following abbreviations, listed in alphabetical order, were used to identify the references corresponding to each set of the hereafter published character traits (see Part I of the data list):

— CB, and two digits indicating the year of publication: Current Biographies

— GMS: Great Movie Stars, by David Shipman, A & W Visual Library, St. Martin's Press, New York, 1972

— LL 78: Lincoln Library of Sports Champions, 1978 edition

— NYT, followed by the month and year of publication: New York Times Biographies, articles collected at the San Diego Public Library from 1972 to 1980

— SS: Superstars, by Franz Litsky, 1973

— WWF: Who's Who in Football, by Ronald L. Mendell and Timothy B. Phares, Arlington House, New Rochelle, New York, 1974.

The same material can be tested in a number of different ways. If only because it was so difficult to collect, it deserves the most extensive use possible. We present it here to the astrological community for further investigation.

Thousands of American Character Traits

After our search for names and birth data of renowned professionals, we directed our efforts to a factor that had proven, in Europe, to be more important than the professional label: the way of behaving, the temperament and character; in one word, the personality of the tested individuals.

In Europe, personality was shown to be linked more closely with the planetary positions at birth than was the future occupation. But would this prove true with the new data from the United States? It remained to be demonstrated.

Information about individual character traits is easier to collect in big quantities than is officially documented birth data. The lives and behavior of renowned professionals are described in newspaper articles and magazines, and are sometimes the subjects of entire books. The better known a professional, the more writings can be found about him. We avoided entire books devoted to one individual to guard against excessive material about too few notables. Instead, we concentrated our efforts on homogeneous biographical sources that provided short articles about a great number of persons.

After selecting the articles from these references dedicated to the notables for whom we had officially certified birth information, we scanned them for descriptions of the individuals' personalities. Each identifiable character trait was written on an index card, together with the notable's birth data.

Michel first undertook this procedure with the publication Current Biographies, from its first issue in 1940 to May 1980, the last issue available before our departure from San Diego. The character traits he collected were tested for correlations with definite planetary positions, in conformity with our European results. All the predicted results appeared again with the American data. (See the Report on American Data, published by our laboratory.)

The same test was then performed with traits extracted from the series Lincoln Library of Sports Champions (20 volumes), and Superstars by Franz Litsky. Our previous list of Martian traits was applied to the new data from these references, and the expected correlation with Mars positions re-surfaced.

After our departure from San Diego, Terry Krall, a well-known astrologer from San Diego, continued collecting from ten years of New York Times Biographies those corresponding to our certified birth information. Thus, we have the material for a third analysis of the relationship between character traits and planetary positions at birth. This analysis is on-going, and as the results are known, they will also be published in a future Report on American Data.

We also checked the character traits given in Great Movie Stars and Who's Who in Football for a small number of renowned cases for which the other biographical references did not provide enough traits, or no traits at all.

Presentation of the Data

Our entire American data collection is hereafter presented in the following way. Character traits were identified for the approximately 500 most renowned personalities in our collection of 1400 notables. For these cases, presented in the first part of the book, the names and birth data are followed by a list of the collected traits, with their references. Each case is illustrated by a complete chart in wheel form.

In the second part of the book, we have the notables for whom no articles were written in the consulted references. Therefore, their names and birth data are not followed by a character trait list. One or two will probably emerge from anonymity into the limelight in the course of this year or those that follow. For instance, Robert L. Crippen, a NASA astronaut, was not selected prior to this year for space travel and therefore had no articles describing his personality. But in April, 1981 he was chosen to pilot the first space shuttle for the Columbia Project, together with John Watts Young (who had already been in space and is listed in the first part of this book with character traits and a complete chart). We can guess that articles describing Crippen will be published in April, 1981 in several of our references. But for the sake of objectivity, we must not change the clear-cut time limits assigned to our data collection: the end of July, 1980, when we left California. Crippen will remain in the second part of this book, without character traits or a chart, despite his recently acquired fame.

Other, less recent celebrities are similar. If they were not described in our standardized references, we preferred not to look elsewhere for articles about them, even if we felt that they deserved one. (Examples: Beau Bridges and Janet Leigh, actors.) We could have discovered several pieces, and would have had to make arbitrary choices. Had we done so, how could we have avoided using those most favorable to our hypotheses, leaving the others out? Such a procedure often produces imaginary confirmations of aberrant theses. We absolutely had to avoid it and be contented with what our clear-cut references provided.

Endless improvements seem desirable when research is under way; but there is a time for deciding that it has come to an end and that no further additions can be made. We have reached this point with our American data. It is time to accept them as they are, and to entrust them to our publisher. Let us hope that they will appear acceptable to a large number of astrologers who are interested in testing and validating their craft through objectively collected birth records. There is a need for these documents to give a more solid basis to the science of cosmic influences.
